A UK law called the ‘Investigatory Powers Act’ was recently established, which requires Internet service providers to store the Internet connection records of every customer for the past year. These records include what websites were visited but not the particular web page or any action carried out on that web page. UK Government agencies are allowed to access these records (though not the content of messages) without a warrant for the purpose of law enforcement.

To what extent do you support or oppose this form of bulk data retention and access by UK Government agencies?

The Investigatory Powers Act also allows UK Government agencies to access data including the content of messages stored on specific computers, mobile devices and networks. This kind of targeted surveillance requires a warrant signed off by an independent judge.

To what extent do you support or oppose this form of targeted surveillance by UK Government agencies?
