Tonight the BBC is set to broadcast an episode of Panorama about North Korea that was filmed on a trip to the country that included students from the London School of Economics (LSE). The footage was recorded by BBC reporters posing as students from the LSE.

The LSE has asked for the programme not to be shown because they say the BBC put their students at risk and believe it will endanger their staff and students working across the world.

The BBC says that all of the real LSE students involved were warned of the situation before arriving in North Korea and believe that the programme should be shown because it is in the national interest.
