Abu Qatada was given asylum in Britain 1993 after fleeing religious persecution in Jordan. Since then he has been convicted in his absence of terrorist offences in Jordan and British intelligence services suspect he has continued to be involved in terrorist activity, though he has not been convicted of terrorism in the UK.

In 2005 a British court ruled that he should be deported to Jordan. Abu Qatada challenged his deportation, claiming that he would not receive a fair trial in Jordan as evidence obtained from torture would be used against him. The government have now obtained guarantees from Jordan that evidence from torture will not be used against him, meaning it is legal to deport him, but Abu Qatada is seeking to appeal against the court ruling. The British government say he has left it too late to appeal.

In most British schools children are taught in classes with children of the same age group, regardless of different abilities. In some other countries children are held back a year if they don't make enough progress and are taught with younger children.

Would you support or oppose introducing a system of holding back children a year if they don't make enough progress?

Female genital mutilation (or female circumcision) has been illegal in Britain since 1985 and it has been illegal for the procedure to be done to a British citizen abroad since 2003-2005. It is estimated that tens of thousands of women in Britain have suffered female genital mutilation, but there have not been any prosecutions.

What do you think is the main reason the police have not made any prosecutions for female genital mutilation?

The police have not made any prosecutions for female genital mutilation because it is difficult to gather evidence of procedures conducted secretly abroad

YouGov Weighting Data

In addition to weighting by age, gender, social class and region (weighted and unweighted figures shown in the tables), YouGov also weighted its raw data by newspaper readership and political party identification:
