The Leveson Report recommended a new system of press regulation involving an independent external check of the adequacy of any press self-regulator and argued that this would aim to prevent a repetition of the press abuses that led to the Leveson Inquiry. Many newspaper companies oppose this proposal and argue that an external auditor for the press self-regulator amounted to government interference in the free press. Instead, they set up and joined the Independent Press Standards Organisation (IPSO), which is not subject to checking by an independent external body. Lord Justice Leveson said in his report that if newspapers refuse to join his recommended system of independently checked self-regulation then Parliament should pass a law to impose it on them. Presently, most national newspapers have set up and joined the Independent Press Standards Organisation (IPSO), which only meets some of the recommendations of the Leveson Report and is not subject to checking by an independent external body. If the press refuse to join a regulator that is independently and externally checked, which of the following do you think should be the response? Please tick all that apply.

When the Leveson Inquiry was established, it was in two parts. The second part was to look into: the extent of unlawful or improper conduct within newspaper organisations, the way in which the police investigated allegations or evidence of unlawful conduct at certain newspapers, the extent to which the police received corrupt payments and how this was allowed to happen, and the extent of corporate governance and management failures at newspaper companies, and the role, if any, of politicians and others, in relation to any failure to investigate wrongdoing at certain newspapers. At the time, the second part of the Inquiry was delayed while criminal investigations into the press took place. The criminal investigations and trials have now been completed. The Government has announced it is consulting on whether to bring into force a new law which was recommended by the Leveson Report and enacted by Parliament, which would introduce a system of penalties for newspapers who do not join a regulator that is subject to external checks. The Government argues that they should have discretion over whether or not the law comes into force. Supporters of stronger regulation of the press argue that the introduction of the law should not be subject to Government discretion. Newspapers argue that the law is wrong in principle and should not be brought into force, and if necessary repealed. Which of the following statements comes closest to your view?
