123. Lame Duck Session | Continuing Resolution Date

It seems unlikely that Congress will pass all the individual annual spending bills that fund the federal government before the October 1st deadline. If Congress fails to pass spending legislation, there would be a partial federal government shutdown until funding legislation is signed into law. Rather than letting the government shut down, members of Congress are considering different proposals that will temporarily fund the federal government until a final deal can be reached. Some members of Congress want to push the deadline to early next year and let the next President and next Congress handle it, while other members of Congress want to push the deadline to just after the election around December 9. That would require a "lame duck" session of Congress where President Obama and the current Congress would make the final deal. What do you think Congress should do? (A) Move the deadline to early next year and let the next President and the next Congress handle it; (B) Move the deadline to December 9th and let President Obama the current Congress handle it; (C) Not sure
