People sometimes talk about 'net immigration', meaning the difference between the number of people coming to Britain each year to live, and the number leaving Britain to live in another country.

What do you think is the current level of net immigration into Britain? If you are not sure, please give your best guess.

If the EU rules that a limit would be illegal, which of these statements comes closer to your view?

[Asked to those who support a limit on immigration from EU countries; n=1098]

Just as we expect people to obey laws they don't like, Britain should obey rules it has agreed to and not act illegally
The dangers of uncontrolled immigration from the EU are so great that Britain should set a firm limit, even if this means defying EU rules

The EU introduced the European arrest warrant in 2004. This allows member states to require other countries to hand over people they want to put on trial for criminal offences that attract prison sentences of at least a year. Britain recently opted out of a number of EU justice measures, including the arrest warrant.

Now Mr Cameron and Theresa May, the Home secretary, want Britain to opt back into the arrest warrant. They argue that it will help Britain to bring to trial suspected criminals who flee to other EU countries. Their critics say the arrest warrant system could mean Britons being sent abroad for trial for relatively minor offences.

On balance, do you think Britain should or should not opt back in to the European arrest warrant?

The amount of money each country in the European Union pays towards the EU budget is based upon each country's economy. The British economy has performed better than most other European countries in recent years, and the European Union has now said that Britain should pay an extra £1.7 billion in contributions to reflect our healthier economy.
