The UK's largest care home company, Southern Cross, has recently announced it is in "critical financial condition" after suffering half year losses of £311 million. The company currently looks after 31,000 people in 750 care homes across the country. If its financial situation worsens, do you think the Government should or should not provide public funds to the company to prevent it going bankrupt?

As someone gets older, they are likely to need to pay for care. How much do you think the Government and the individual should contribute towards this care?

The government should pay all the costs of care regardless of people's own assets or income

At present, if someone has assets worth more than £23,000, they do not qualify for state funds to pay for care in old age. This could mean that some people may need to sell their homes or liquidate other assets to pay for their old age. Some argue that it is unfair to make people sell their homes to pay for their care whilst others claim that if these people were not made to pay for the care themselves, the Government would need to either cut spending or raise taxes to ensure they were cared for.

Do you think people should or should not be made to sell their homes or liquidate their assets to pay for their own elderly care?

They should be made to sell their homes

Some people have called on the Government to raise the asset threshold, currently £23,000, at which people would have to pay for their own elderly care even if this means that spending on other areas would need to be cut or taxes would have to rise. Other however claim that the Government should lower this figure even further and make more people pay for their elderly care.

Following the public ballot for Olympic tickets, some groups have criticised the organising committee for not giving preference to certain groups when purchasing tickets. Other however claim that, as this was a public ballot, it is only right that everyone had an equal chance of getting tickets. Which, if any, of the following groups do you believe should have been given preferential treatment in the public ballot, even if this meant there were less tickets available for the general public?
